Family History Month 2007

by Curt B. Witcher

Family History Month 2007 officially begins in just a few hours. That the entire month of October is designated nationally as Family History Month should speak to each of us about the importance of engaging in this worthwhile activity. And that something so informative and enlightening also can be so enjoyable should entice everyone to do at least one family heritage activity in the next thirty-one days, even if it's just looking at an old family photo album, organizing those family letters before they are lost, or watching one of the many fantastic programs on Roots Television (click on the Roots Television link found at <www.GenealogyCenter.Info>). Further on in this ezine is a complete list of Family History Month programs at the Allen County Public Library's Main Library. Participating in a few of those sessions could be quite worthwhile as well.

This past Thursday, the 2007 edition of the "Periodical Source Index" (or PERSI as it is often called) was loaded on the HeritageQuestOnline.com web site. This latest edition of PERSI brings the total number of periodical titles indexed to 6,652 and the total number of article citations to 2,038,494! PERSI is the largest and most comprehensive subject index to genealogy and local history periodicals published in North America and the British Isles. It really should be a must-check source for every family line and geographic location one is researching. If you've never used PERSI or don't believe you're getting the full benefit from the index, sign up for the "Using PERSI" program on Tuesday, October 22nd from 2 p.m. to 3 p.m. in the Main Library's Computer Classroom by calling (260) 421-1225.

Happy Family History Month!!

Gazetteers for Canadian Place Name Research

by Don Litzer

Alan Rayburn notes that place names are "a significant reflection of a nation's cultural and linguistic heritage." For genealogists, place names can also be important clues to revealing successful research opportunities.

It is important to analyze place names in their historic and legal contexts. As the lands which became Canada were developed, their place names evolved as well. For example, in 1841 the British province of Upper Canada became Canada West, which became Ontario in 1867. More recently, municipal reorganization has combined numerous previously independent Canadian townships, villages, and cities into entities with often completely different names. The establishment of Metropolitan Toronto in 1953 was the first such large-scale restructuring, followed by a second round beginning in 1969 that included establishment of the Ottawa-Carleton regional municipality. Since the late 1990s, extensive amalgamation has taken place. According to the Ontario Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Housing, as of January, 2004, there were only 445 municipalities in Ontario, consolidated from 815 in July, 1996.

The Genealogy Center has several historical sources published with the purpose of comprehensively identifying Canadian places. Lovell's "Gazetteer of British North America" (971 L943), published in 1873, includes entries for more than 6,000 communities and more than 1,500 lakes and rivers. These entries frequently include information about business and industry, churches, and institutions—with a separate section detailing railway and steamboat connections to those communities. The 1919 edition of Bullinger's "Postal & Shippers Guide for the United States and Canada" (973.003 B87) identifies the smallest populated Canadian places.

A novel source is the "Guide Officiel du Service Postal Canadien" (971.003 C16g) which lists, for every Canadian post office operating on December 1, 1916, the township or parish (or, in the case of prairie and western provinces, legal descriptions down to the section number) and electoral district for its location, in addition to the postmaster's name.

A valuable, contemporary Internet resource to complement these historical works is the "Geographical Names of Canada" website at http://geonames.nrcan.gc.ca/index\_e.php Here some 500,000 place names in the "Canadian Geographical Names Data Base" can be searched in English.

Selective place-name dictionaries can help identify a place with greater certainty, and/or provide more context for it. Alan Rayburn's "Dictionary of Canadian Place Names" (971 R213p), published in 1997, provides such detail on 6,225 names, the most comprehensive of any such work. Additionally, the book's introduction identifies current and historical province or territory-level resources (many of which the Genealogy Center owns) that provide useful leads for further research.

American Home Missionary Society Papers
by John D. Beatty

"The American Home Missionary Society Papers," available on microfilm in the Genealogy Center, offer a rich, primary source of information about religious missionaries in nineteenth century America. A valuable tool for local history, as well as for religious and social history, they can sometimes yield names of residents in various communities that can be useful, as well, to genealogists.

In 1826 at a convention in New York City, representatives of the Congregational, Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Associate Reformed churches organized the society as a means of raising revenue to support missionaries of these denominations and help them establish churches, providing a salary stipend and advice as they worked to form new congregations in communities that could not otherwise afford them. The resulting papers, which date between 1816 and 1936, consist of incoming correspondence from missionaries in the field, outgoing correspondence from administrators at the home office, miscellaneous administrative material, annual reports, and copies of the Home Missionary, a periodical published between 1828 and 1909. The original papers are housed in the Amistad Research Center at Tulane University and are available on microfilm through Thomson Gale.

Local historians and genealogists will likely find the incoming correspondence to be the most valuable part of the set. As missionaries entered various communities, they reported back, sometimes in considerable detail, their personal assessment of each locale and the prospects for churches. These first-hand accounts can help place an ancestral community into a broader cultural and social context, and if an ancestor was a Presbyterian or Congregationalist at a time when a missionary visited, especially if they were a financial contributor, he or she may have been mentioned in a letter.

While many states are represented in the collection, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin dominate the holdings.

Regrettably, there is no every-name index to the papers. David G. Horvath's guide (GC 929.102 Am3g, located in the Microtext Guides section) offers a series-by-series overview and state-by-state descriptions, but does not identify specific correspondents. However, incoming correspondence on the microfilm is arranged by state, by year, then alphabetically by author. The Indiana series has been abstracted in detail under the editorship of L. C. Rudolph and published in a three-volume typescript, "Indiana Letters: Abstracts of Letters from Missionaries on the Indiana Frontier to the American Home Missionary Society 1824-1893" (977.2 R83i in the Microtext Guides section). While this volume lists every correspondent, describes each letter in some detail, and includes an index, it is still possible for names to appear in a letter that were not otherwise abstracted.

"The American Home Missionary Society Papers" provide excellent coverage for persons researching and writing local and congregational history. While genealogists may find them esoteric, they should not be dismissed as a useful research tool.
